THE SYSTEM

During the 1980s, researchers on the human eye & vision in general as well as on visual search have been concerned that it was not yet clear whether the human system really is "functional" in the sense that it is able to detect and respond to relevant information in the visual field.

The possibility of rapid search or scanning of the visual field has been a topic of controversy for many years. Early research on visual search is particularly pertinent and we return to this topic.

First and foremost, researchers with similar goals sought to understand more the visual system's abilities and limits in the visual search process. Second, it is possible that the visual system's capabilities are limited.

It is clear that visual search is a very important part of human behavior and that it is a very important part of human behavior.
